Liz Banach
Executive Director
Marylanders to Prevent Gun Violence

Liz Banach is the Executive Director of Marylanders to Prevent Gun Violence. Liz — a hunter’s daughter — grew up in rural Virginia. After graduating from Haverford College, Liz began her career at The Russell Sage Foundation as a scholar assistant assisting eight researchers over the course of two years on projects aimed at bettering the living conditions of people around the world. She attended graduate school at The City University of New York and completed a post graduate psychoanalytic training at The National Institute of Psychoanalysis in New York City. Liz worked in private practice prior to moving to Maryland seven years ago with her family.

Inspired by a moment when she thought her husband and two young children were at a local mall at the time of a shooting she shifted career paths and became involved in the gun violence prevention movement. She began by volunteering with her local Moms Demand Action Chapter and was soon promoted to the Maryland State Chapter Lead. She joined Marylanders to Prevent Gun Violence as their Director of Outreach and was appointed Executive Directors of Marylanders to Prevent Gun Violence two years ago. She is proud to be at the helm of an organization that focuses its attention and resources on those individuals who are disproportionately affected gun violence: people who use a gun to commit suicide and young men and women of color living in urban areas.
